

LIFE OF GOBONE GRAND CLOTHES JAG

Fashions may come and fashions may go, but sailors' clothes will remain the same forever, judging from the likeness in the present costume to that worn by the sailors who piloted Mr. C. Columbus across the Atlantic in 1492, and stumbled across the United States.

So says a bulletin issued by the recruiting service of the navy, telling at length the story of a sailor and his clothes and why. According to this bulletin the sailor is proud of the garments with which he is clothed, and the "gob" likes the cut of his clothes, and there is a roll and jauntiness about him at all times that proclaims his calling. The fact that the "roll" of the sailor is due to his clothes is proved conclusively by prohibition, and now that no doubt remains as to the cause, here goes the sailor's yarn concerning his wearing apparel.

Years ago, in the days of wooden ships, when seamen had to climb the masts and dangle on the yards, reefing and furling the sails in all sorts of weather, convenience and custom ordained the bell-shaped lower ends of the trousers. Time and modern construction of the man of war have not changed the pattern of these trousers. Why the bell-shaped lower ends were necessary for a sailor to climb the masts and reef the sails is not stated in the Navy Department's bulletin, but it seems to be, anyhow, and they still wear 'em. It was always thought the flappy trousers were so designed that the sailor could roll up his trousers when swabbing the deck. This may be a wrong guess, however.

Black Neckercloth.
The sailorman still "clings" to his black silk neckercloth. Draped about his low necked blouse and tied across his breast, it lends a distinction that belongs to the sea. Whether the sailor "clings" to this part of his uniform because of navy regulations or from choice remains a moot question, but he still wears it. The black silk neckercloth is a relic of a token of mourning, worn by British sailors when Lord Nelson died. Since it has been adopted as a regulation part of the uniform.

"The sailor is also a trifle fussy about his hats," continues the bulletin, and he has three of them. All the hats are worn at varying angles, none of them being worn straight upon the head of the sailor. The more to the windward a hat slants, the better time the sailor is having, and the degree of the slant is directly proportional to the sailor's length of service in the Navy. A mystery characterizes the sailor's hat. No one is ever initiated into this mystery of how it is kept on until he joins the navy.

Several New Garments.
War necessitated the addition of several new garments to the sailorman's wardrobe. For service in the cold seas of the arctic region the sailors were provided with heavy pea coats of extra weight. Admiral Samuel McGowan, chief of the bureau of supplies and accounts, recently made the statement that "if the sailor had on any more clothes than he is now wearing he couldn't walk."

Into the sailor's bag on the first day of enlistment goes $100 worth of clothing, containing everything from a jack knife to a pea jacket, with buttons, thread and needles, for the sailor does all his own mending while at sea. The equipment is changed to meet the conditions of weather and place of service, and one of the hardest duties with which a sailor is confronted is keeping check on all his equipment and seeing that none of it is borrowed permanently by his best friend and bunkie.

1 DEAD, SCORE HURT IN MILLION OIL FIRE

Eighty Acres of Rich Fields in Texas Swept by Flames.

WICHITA FALLS, Tex., Nov. 10.—One dead, a score injured and property loss of more than $1,000,000 was the toll taken yesterday by a fire that swept eighty acres of oil territory near Waggoner City, twenty-two miles from here.

Lightning struck an oil tank on the outskirts of Waggoner City, which is said to be the largest unincorporated town in America. The tank exploded and a wave of burning oil swept down the surface of rain water covered streets, setting fire to everything with which it came in contact.

The bulk of the business section was destroyed, according to reports. Waggoner City has no telephone or railroad connections and the roads are almost impassable. Details are meager.

The fire is believed to have covered what is described as the most congested oil field in the world, and it is said probably 200 derricks were destroyed.
